The longest-running Broadway musical, The Phantom of the Opera, is keeping audiences interested by casting big name talents as the Phantom. However, as of late, the #MeToo movement has deterred many actors from accepting the role of “creepy-dude-with-a-mask-who-kidnaps-women-and-makes-them-sing-for-him-in-his-underground-bachelor-pad”.

On Friday, I spent my movie night watching the documentary Free Solo, in which a man scales a mountain with his bare hands and feet. (Proud) I did half a chin-up today, so I think I’m ready for Kilimanjaro.

Boy Band BTS, a tween-favorite, will be releasing a new song called “Dynamite” on MP3, vinyl, and cassette. It’s the perfect ploy to brainwash grandpa into liking Korean pop. If you play the record backwards it says, “BTS is my dark lord and master.”

A video of a Brazilian cow “singing” went viral on YouTube. Thanks to its new fame, the cow plans to quit the farm and move to Tinseltown to become a star.

Scientists state that the cacao plant, the base for all chocolatey foods, may be extinct by 2050 due to climate change. In other news, carob farmers were startled by a maniacal laugh coming from their crops.

WorkHow sells a Decade Planner, in which you can set goals for the next ten years. It was invented by the world’s most organized procrastinator.

The NIH just put $76 million towards researching the human placenta, a key temporary organ we know very little about despite the fact that it’s responsible for human life. Past funding was relocated to another source that’s also coincidentally responsible for human life. [graphic of viagra bottle]

Twitter announced a new partnership with the NBA, in which the second half of the game will be streamed live, following one player around the court. Instagram will launch a similar live stream of just the mascot.
